UP NEXT is a free texting tool that offers personalized support with college search, application, federal student aid, and loan repayment through automatic text reminders.

Students looking for life and career advice should check out Career Village's resources for career information and advice.

I'm First! is an online community celebrating and supporting first-generation college students.

Searching for Scholarships

Your college is the first place you should connect with when seeking financial aid. In addition to financial aid packages, many schools also offer talent scholarships that typically require a separate application. Head to your high school's guidance office and the local library to ask about local scholarship availability. You can also look for leads on local scholarships at rotary clubs, women's organizations, and your town's chamber of commerce.

Some employers offer tuition assistance for their employees, and sometimes even their employees' dependents. Ask your employer as well as the employers of your immediate family members what educational resources they have.

Fastweb is a scholarship search engine that can connect you to more than 1.5 million scholarships. Another great source of student financial aid information is Finaid.

High school students can start earning scholarship for college by using RaiseMe, which partners with colleges and universities to offer students scholarships starting in 9th grade.
